1. All the advice and knowledge got you where you are
2. We will share proven key insights and practices
3. You adapt, apply, and assess the key insights and practices until it improves your selection process.

Key Insight

What do companies that are more successful at selecting operations employees know to set their hiring managers up for high level of selection success?

Answer: They know what they are hiring for

Why is this so important?

“A problem defined, is a problem half-solved.”

— Albert Einstein

Knowing what you are hiring for is such critical attribute in good operation employee selection because it applies a great management principle.

1. “Begin with the end in mind.” Stephen Covey’s second habit of highly effective people
2. “If you don't know where you are going, any road will get you there.” Lewis Carroll (from Alice in Wonderland),
3. “You are more likely to get there if you know where there is.” David McClaskey (from upcoming book on operations excellence)

Why “begin with the end in mind” is a critical attribute in just about everything involving leadership and management (including hiring)?

Having clear and unambiguous knowledge of the objective leads better results
